Dual-SIM Android, Third 'Droid Phone from Motorola

Hello yet again Moto

Yeah, not much to look at!

How many of you remember the time when Motorola was a force to reckon with in the mobile phone industry? Probably not too many since time passes differently when talking about emerging technologies. But nevertheless, Motorola used to be quite the 'mobile' power during the late 90s and early 2K. And although they kept manufacturing phones, their voice has yet to be heard clearly throughout the halls of the great (aka Nokia and Sony Ericsson).

Lately, 'hello Moto' seems to have fallen in love with a certain operating system called Android. And they seem to be so infatuated that a leak has mentioned them preparing a third Android smartphone that, unlike the previous 'Cliq' and 'Droid' phones, will rely solely on its touch interface display for input. The device might also be the first... regionalized device seeing how it will be a Dual-SIM phone offering support for both GSM as well as CDMA (seeing how it seems to be specifically created for the Chinese market).

While the leak did not mention a lot of things regarding the device's capabilities, I can tell you that the Zeppelin (as seems to be its current name) does come with a 3.1-inch 480 x 320 touchscreen as well as HDMI video out, which would make it the first Android phone to feature HDMI. Other features include a 5-megapixel camera and what seems to be wireless connectivity though whether it is Wi-Fi or the Chinese WAPI is not currently known.

The speculated launch date pins the device as being ready for a China-based launch in early 2010 and since 2010 is just a few months away, I am pretty sure that we'll be seeing more from the Zeppelin in the days slash months to come.

We are just a few, but there are many of you, Softpedia users, out there.
